This strath is half cultivation and half marsh; a number of small farmsteads besprinkle it, giving a human association to the scene without robbing it of its wildness. At the foot of the pass, 1$ miles beyond Bethesda, a new bridge has been thrown across the stream. This leads to the farm-road under the mountains that form the west flank of the valley. This route, being lower down, is not such an effective one as the main road, but it brings before the eye a view of the Falls of Ogwen, a broken series of fully exposed cataracts at the head of the glen, which the main road does not admit of. The east side is monopolised by the long sloping shoulder of Braich-du--an abutment of Carnedd Dafydd, very rough and steep in its descent to the pass. The front presented by the Glyders and the Tryfan is particularly bold and rugged. At the top of the pass, 4j miles...
