Excerpt: . her eyes glanced round the room, and rested complacently on the glow a frosty sunset diffused over the yellow hangings, the tables piled up with Sevres and Nankin china, Hindoo idols and apanese figures, carvings and bronzes, antique cabinets filled with coins, spindle-legged consoles ranged against the walls, and smaller ornaments. The pictures behind, standing forth in a blaze of light---St. Sebastian prominent in a ruddy haze, --a portrait, said to be by Rembrandt, of a golden brown, --and Dutch landscapes, with luminous points upon tree and stream, calling up an ideal world of warmth and summer, to which the soft, penetrating odour of rose-leaves, in large blue and white pots, came as a fitting atmosphere. You seem very comfortable here, was her remark, as her eye ranged round. Really cosy and comfortable. I only hope it will last. A sigh was the reply. Then with a kind of heavy movement, natural to her tall figure, Lady Danvers rose and wandered round the room. I wonder where all these beautiful things come from, she observed, examining the miniatures, snuff-boxes, and artistic treasures, opening and shutting illustrated volumes in gaudy bindings, and passing her long fingers over the surface of cups and vases. Sent, I suppose, for sale; but what advantage can it be to have them? I wonder they trust him. My husband s knowledge, replied Aunt Amelia, coldly, gives value to art. The very fact that Louis has had these things in...
