Not illustrated. 1883 Excerpt: . . . outline, speak directly to the eye, and appeal to our ideas of harmony and proportion. A happy use of these, aside from the idea, gives rise to a train of enjoyable sensations, peculiarly their own. Thus the pleasures from successful art are manifold. One of the chief objects of art is the illustration of poetry and history. Do we not feel more powerfully the agonizing death-struggle of the priest of Neptune from the statue of the Laocoon than from Virgil's description of it Winckelmann, indeed, in this instance, ranked the poet much below the sculptor. Is not the melancholy fate of Beatrice impressed upon us more forcibly by that sad, reproachful glance portrayed by Guido, than by the tragedy of Shelley Books give us a far-off, unreal notion of things, a feeling of an action happening in another land and at another time; while a picture or a statue brings it into our actual presence, and gives us a congenial and fraternal sympathy with its characters. We see that they are of like form and feature with ourselves, and were surely possessed of a like nature. Aided by the brush or chisel, we enter more readily into their joys and sufferings. M. s. T. Three marble statues have been placed in the empty niches of the rez-de-chaussée of the grand court of the Louvre on the northern facade. They are the Venus, holding a rose in her right, and the torch of love in her...
